GILLE'S,

A Reliable Prescription Drug Store.

"CLINTON, honeyboy, isn't it charming and awfully delightfully wicked to go off on this spree all by ourselves?"

"Absurdly so," replied the still infa-ntuated young husband, squeezing the plump arm tucked so confidently under his.

"And Aunt Mary thinks we are in Connecticut, while Uncle James believes us to be in Canada and our mothers and fathers are sure we are in Florida. It is just too lovely for anything, isn't it?"

"And so we escape the deadly bother of a Christmas tree and the intermin-able dinner party and all the sticky children. And we will have our Christmas eve dinner all by our lonesome in the swellest place in town. And here we are, honeybun."

The happy couple stepped into the vestibule, shaking the flakes from their coats and stamping the snow from their feet. The light lingered lovingly on the pretty young face with its blue just going to turn out horrid, after all."

"Now, honey—"

"Don't honey me! Please call me by my proper name. I am not a child.
You just said so."

"Hon, dearest, don't do that!"

She was showing symptoms of tears, though she bravely tried to hide her feelings. She felt the eyes of the very respectable head waiter upon her. His portly back was turned, but she sensed the disapprobation in his attitude. The lights swam, and the hum of conversation was like the strange noises in deep forests at night. She winked furiously, angry with herself. She finally overcame her temptation to dissolve in tears, only to find that her honeyboy was sitting partly turned away in an attitude of deep dejection as well as set determination.

People came in from the snowy streets laden with parcels and carrying bunches of holly and mistletoe, and every one beamed with joy and pleas-

HE JUMPED TO THE CONCLUSION THAT SHE HAD RELENTED.

eyes and rosy cheeks and the snowy teeth showing between the smiling lips. And the same as light looked on the handsome, clear cut features of the tall man with his fond and protecting air. "A fine couple," it spluttered. "A fine couple. Ah, I've seen many such, but they all end the same way."

With this pessimistic remark the light blinked wickedly. The door closed on the young couple as they walked slowly along the thick carpet waiting for that lovely personage, the head waiter, to assign them to a place. This astute personage instantly sized them up as a recently wedded couple and beckoned them to an ideal spot, a cozy little table in a corner, half surrounded by palms. There they were shut in from prying eyes and shut out of the hurly and noise of the rest of the world. As a work of supererogation the head waiter brought a bowl of white roses and with an unctuous smile, directed at no one in particular, set them in the center of the table, and this called up a pretty blush on the fair one's cheeks.

Clinton took the elaborate menu and with a hopeless glance at his foreign names handed it to his bride, saying in the blind hope that she understood it.
"You order the dinner, honeybun."

Miriam glanced in the mirror and gave a cry of dismay.

"Oh, I am perfectly disreputable!
Just look at my hair!"

She remembered the time when she tried to translate the menu to some friends in a restaurant, giving poison aux yeux vives as "poison to the lively waters." She was not going to allow Clinton to gloat over her—above all, at this early stage of their married life.
So she returned the menu to him with great apparent self abnegation.

"No, you order, honeyboy."

"I asked you to do it, honeybun."

"Oh, well, I can't do it. I never had to order a dinner in my life. Father or some one always did." This last was said with just the least little bit of spirit. Besides, she was hungry; so was he. That fact may pardon his next words, spoken with what he thought a noble and masterful air:

"It is time you learned then. Now, honeybun, I don't want you to look at me in that grieved and frightened way.
I am in the right. It is your duty—yes, to learn to make out the dinner cards. You are not a child."

"Sir, I never had to do such a thing, and I won't; so now! I think you are
